Dann steckt er den Brief zu sich in den Waffenrock, an die heimlichste Stelle neben das Rosenblatt. Und denkt: Er wird bild duften davon. Und denkt: Vielleicht indet ihn einmal Einer ... Und denkt: Denn der Feind ist nah.

Then he puts the letter away inside his tunion in the most secret place, beside the roseleaf. And thinks: It will soon take on that fragrance. And thinks: Perhaps someone will find it someday ... And thinks: For the enemy is near.

Meindert Peters (Oxford) Research Talk: 'Dancing Modernist Literature'

Dance adaptations of modernist works by authors such as Rainer Maria Rilke, Thomas Mann, and Virginia Woolf have been thriving in the last twenty years. Why? Modernist literature's exploration of the mind and its experiments with language seem at odds with the non-verbal medium of dance and its emphasis on the body and movement. By turning to this untold history of dance adaptations, Meindert Peters's current research project 'Dancing Modernist Literature' generates a new understanding of the reception and continuing relevance of modernist literature in the twenty-first century.

These dance adaptations have uniquely foregrounded the moving body in quintessential modernist concerns, for example over identity. When Franz Kafka's Gregor Samsa turns into a vermin overnight, for example, Arthur Pita's 2011 ballet adaptation of The Metamorphosis emphasizes how he tumbles and falls, tests his physical abilities, and reaches new heights. Samsa's alterity is not merely psychological but also bound up with corporeal pleasure and pain. My research centres around this corporeality, examining the twofold role bodily movement plays in modernist literature's enduring legacy and appeal. The dance adaptations I explore reveal that the figure in motion and flux is an important subject of these literary texts, complicating modernist concerns over more intangible issues such as identity and language. And they show how the dancing body can be a powerful medium for rearticulating modernist narratives.

In this research talk, Peters discusses some of this work, including his practical work with choreographers.

This event is co-sponsored by the Transnational Research Network (TRN), Cultures of Screen, Performance & Print Network (CuSPP), and the RSHA.
